Common Cremation Questions

Here are the answers to some of the most common cremation questions.

Do teeth burn during cremation? Teeth usually burn up during the cremation process. Tooth fragments that are not burnt up will be ground during the ash processing.

Do cremains have DNA? Cremains rarely hold enough DNA to be read during an analysis. The bone and teeth fragments left behind after the process are ground into a fine powder, making it almost impossible to extract viable DNA for testing.

Can you be cremated without a funeral? You can be cremated without a funeral service. This is called direct cremation. Your loved ones can always have a memorial service at a later date after the cremation if they or you so choose.

What is the most affordable way to be cremated? Whole-body donations, or donating the entire body to science, comes with a no-cost cremation, making it the most affordable way to be cremated.

Are the ashes really the person? Cremation ashes, sometimes called cremains, are the bits of bones left over after the cremation process. So yes, the ashes really are the person. Every cremation provider has safety and identification protocols in place to ensure that the proper cremains are returned to the proper family, so you can rest assured the ashes you receive are the ashes of your lost loved one.

Are bodies cremated in their caskets? Bodies will be removed from their caskets if the caskets are not suitable for cremation. But, if the casket is able to be cremated, the body will be cremated while still inside the casket.

Are bodies cremated with clothes on? Bodies are cremated in what they died in with direct cremation. If they're cremated after a funeral, they will be cremated in the clothes they wore in for the service.

Do bodies sit up during cremation? Because of the cremation chamber's high heat, some bodies go into what's called a pugilistic stance, meaning the elbows, knees, and fists clench due to the extreme heat. The pugilistic stance may make the body appear shorter or stiffer, but it will not sit up.

Is cremation common? The National Funeral Directors Association states the current rate of cremation is about 56%, while traditional burial is 37% in the US.

Can you watch a cremation? Some cremation providers do allow the bereaved to view the cremation from a separate chamber. However, as the entire process takes several hours, most only allow the bereaved to view the body being placed into the cremation chamber.
